CITY OF MEXICO, Sept. 16th, 1887 .- The Mexican's "Fourth of July" comes around every 16th of September and generally lasts three days. It is held in honor of the declaration of independence made in 1810 BOOK, Shows against Spanish rule. Hidalgo, a feeble old curate of the Catholic church, was the Washington of the period. He chose for a flag an ensign with the picture of the Vir-gin of Guadalupe on one side and Inde pendence on the other. As a leader he was a failure, being captured and shot before he attained much success but the work he began finally triumphed after a hard struggle 6 25 of cears. Their declaration was short and 7 49 was made by Hidalgo at eleven o'clock at 9 24 night, when he rose from his bed, gathered a few Indians around him and shouted,

Yet on the day pre-vious there were civil and military proces-sions and torch-light processions at night; besides there were foot and donkey races. But the grand display of all was reserved until the sixteenth, when all the foreign legations hung out their respective banners to the breeze, besides private and public buildings were decorated with flags, bunting and green boughs wreathed with flowers. The street processions consisted of mutualistic societies, the children of the public schools, labor unions, "cargadores," or those who hire themselves out as common carriers, fire companies, the school of correction, and va-PERRY, SMOOT & CO. They have fine praucing horses, and when bounding ahead with drawn swords and long lassos by their side, they indeed present a formidable front, and considering their expertness with the lasso, they pre-sent a very novel feature, but in their hands it is claimed to be an excellent weapon both of defense and offense. Following these came the artillery wagons, bands, trumpeters mounted on black horses, next the white horse cavalry and bay horse reserves, with a large company of officers in deposit and others whom the government pays to keep quiet. Next, and the most beautiful display were three floats representing the United States' part of the procession. The first was an allegorical representation of the landing of Columbus. This was provided with Spaniards and Indians and drawn by horses which, when started, went at full speed and landed Columbus high and dry over the bow of his ship, and spilled the other Spaniards and Indians all along the

The Americans were the only foreign colony represented and hence drew many pleasing comments from the Mexican press and people. In the afternoon a children's ball was given in the mining pavilion, and was followed by the usual spread eagle speeches by members of Congress and other political aspirants.
